BANQUET HALL OF OLD ENGLAND HERE

Walnut and Oak Panelling of Rotherwas House on View in Charles Gallery.

FROM ELIZABETHAN TIMES

Open Fire Burns Under the Great Mantel as It Did 300 Years Ago.

Rare indeed is the prize that has been brought to America by Charles of London and placed on view in his New York gallery. It is nothing less than the entire panelling, in carved walnut and oak, of the banqueting hall of a historic English mansion, Rotherwas House, dating from just after Elizabeth's time and touching a level of artistic craftsmanship that was certainly not common even at the height of that period.

There is something ruthless about such a procedure, this robbing of an ancient building of its very clothes, ave stripping off its actual skin. For not only the banqueting hall, but all the ten other rooms of the old house that were panelled have been or are even now being removed, prior to being sold to begin life again in some modern and quite possibly incongruous home. This, however is a matter of more concern to English lovers of their country's art and traditions than to Americans, and it has been in fact already told in despatches from London that much cha-

Above this moulding and forming the chief feature of the frieze is a series of arches formed by half round pilasters, richly carved and of noble proportions. Over all runs a cornice, also carved, its themes being fruit and flowers, in subdued pattern. The color of this old walnut is extremely fine; it is of a reddish brown tone, matched and contrasted according to the designs. As you look upon it you egin to feel a renewed sense of the dignity and spaciousness of the England that was; of the rugged, vigorous character of the people that built such houses; of the continuing beauty and fitness of such a wall as this was and is. When you have penetrated to the inner hall it may well have crossed your mind that this was the very bone and substance of England.

Rotherwas House could have performed this service for you as well, perhaps as most others, so far as such rooms as the delectation of Americans, are concerned. It evidently had the quality, the character, that counts.

And it remains to speak of the chief jewel in this ancient wooden crown, the chimneypiece. The famillar division of the overmantel into three principal spaces required four upright boundaries or supports for the cornice, and these take the form of caryatides. Joseph P.
